

Sources from the World Wide Web (Not Databases)

- When listing an online source originally produced in a printed format, use the general guidelines you would use to cite the printed form. Then follow it with information that tells where to find the source online.
- Web sites should have author (if given), title underlined, date of publication or update (if available), originator (if available), date of access, and the URL or electronic address. [MLA 5.9.1]
- When a source has no page numbers or any other kind of reference numbers (such as paragraph or section numbers), no number can be given in the parenthetical reference (internal documentation). The work should be cited in its entirety [MLA 6.4.1]
